Biography

For almost three decades, Megan Dixon has been helping clients all over the world and across a variety of industries to rapidly identify, investigate, and strategically address potential legal exposure arising from criminal or regulatory violations within her clients' businesses, as those crises are unfolding.

Technology is influencing all areas of law, including investigations. Megan works with clients to help them understand their shifting risk landscape as technology disrupts their industries and helps them to ensure they're maximizing the use of technology to mitigate those risks.

Megan draws on her past experience as a law clerk, federal prosecutor, and Harvard Law School faculty member to help leverage her perspective on dealing with regulators, witnesses, and others in urgent high-stakes matters where it is critical to quickly determine what happened and actively advise clients on the most effective strategies for responding in what are often make-or-break situations for their business.

Megan was working at the U.S. Department of Justice Antitrust Division during the 1990s when international antitrust cartel enforcement came into being, and she has continued to dedicate a significant portion of her years in private practice to advising, speaking, and
